THE EDITOR'S SHOES.

By an unsung hand propelled one day.
Over an arena gate came a pair of old shoes;
And where they landed there they lay,
But a little apart, in the alley's refuse.
A few minutes passed, then, like the wind
That mournfully whistles lorn and lone
Down the chimney in winter, two voices were heard
And this their story, in cracked minor tones:
"We're the editor's shoes, worn out and old;
We've served him long and steadily,
Through summer's heat and winter's cold,
We've borne him oft and readily
When never a stickle for fare had he.
We carried him home without a word,
He walked for his health, he said, and we Never made a sign that we knew or heard.
And many's the pret we've helped down stairs,
And many's the dun we've dodged
with him,
And many's the dog we've bounced unawares,
And the lunch-counter's way we knew
to a pin.
And of the table we've mounted for him,
And rested serenely in all our pride,
While the copy he wrote and handed in,
Or proof he read, and swore, and said,
We were with him always, thick and thin.
When friends grew distant, one by one,
When his paper languished and the tin
To keep it running did not forborne.
Then he roared, red faces grew green each day.
For under his waistcoat, kept apart
From all the world, a picture lay
Of a fair-haired girl, kept in his heart.
He never told of his love,
But westward came to work and wait,
His secret kept till he could prove
His worthiness for such a stake.
And so he'd pinched and laughed along,
And joked and kept his honest way.
He never, knowing, did a wrong
Or pled his stick till one black day.
He put us on the tab, then,
He smoked his old stub pipe and sighed,
As, tilted back, he stuck a pen
Behind his ear and vainly tried
To make a plan to pay his men—
A meagre bill, but great to him—
To pay for paper, press-work, when The postman tossed a letter in.
He picked it up, half reaching it,
And reading, then he seemed to bend;
He laid it down, then groaned a bit
And said: 'She's dead; this is the end.
Dead, buried, ah! my pretty lass,
My bonnie one, with sweetest name,
I loved her well, but let it pass.
She's gone, I'll never work again.'
We knew it too, and late that night
He dragged us stumbling to his home,
And in the gray of morning light
He shot himself; we saw it done.
He and his paper, both are dead,
Pled for this world for evermore,
His copy's done, his last proof read,
Locked up the forms, his work is o'er.
With sears and dirt our portions we,
Devoid of polish, muddy and worn,
Are flung by vulgar hands to be Kicked in the dirt, with ribald scorn.
A gurgling wail, the voices stopped,
But the editor's shoes lay just the same,
A little apart, right where they dropped,
Unknown, save here, to the annals of fame.
